Higher private credit growth in December

- Private credit increased 0.6%mth in December, exceeding our and consensus expectations of a 0.5%mth gain.
- While housing credit continued growing at a steady pace, growth in the personal credit and business lending categories was somewhat stronger than expected.
- Together with upward revisions to historical data, the monthly increase in December took annual growth in total credit to 6.5%yr, a twentymonth high. This represents a notable acceleration from the 4.8%yr annual pace twelve months ago.
- We expect that private credit growth will start facing some headwinds in the coming months including from a slowing in housing markets and still soft consumer spending. Lower interest rates should provide some support through 2025 and beyond.

WESTPAC ECONOMICS

Strong credit growth for now, but headwinds ahead

Mantas Vanagas Senior Economist, Westpac Group P: +61 422 030 326 E: mantas.vanagas@westpac.com.au

Private sector credit rose by 0.6%mth in December, exceeding our and consensus expectations of a 0.5%mth increase. Annual growth lifted to 6.5%, extending the upward trend from late 2023 when growth was 4.8%yr.

Across the major private credit components:

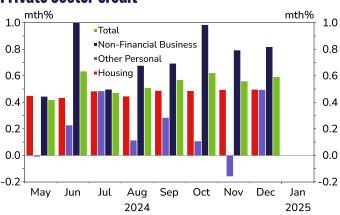

- housing credit (63% of total private credit), rose 0.5%mth, an unchanged pace from each of the prior three months. The owner-occupier segment saw growth easing slightly to 0.4%mth, but this was offset by slightly firmer growth in investor housing credit of 0.6%mth.
- business credit (33% of total private credit) rose 0.8%mth, also an unchanged pace from an upwardly-revised November reading. While the breakdown for business credit by company size is not available for December, recent trends suggest that in the second half of last year borrowing by larger firms was advancing at a firmer pace in comparison to smaller firms.
- other personal credit (4% of total private credit) recovered after a 0.2%mth dip in November, rising 0.5%mth in December.

Credit growth accelerated over the course of 2024, and the last three months saw another step up – the three-month annualised growth rate for total credit now exceed 7% while for business credit it is in double-digits. The acceleration seems to be at odds with high interest rates and restrictive financial conditions. The RBA recently linked that higher pace to strong population growth and rising nominal household incomes.

Looking ahead, despite the upside surprise today, we see some downside risks to credit growth. First, the tailwind from those factors mentioned by the RBA is likely to fade gradually over 2025. In addition, the housing market has been losing momentum, with slowing price growth and lower sales volumes at the end of last year. Eventually, that softer momentum will start feeding into housing credit growth. Meanwhile, unimpressive readings for household spending and business confidence in recent months also point to some downside risks. While interest rate cuts by the RBA over the course of this year should provide some support, they will feed into the effective borrowing rates only gradually.
