Correction deepens, 'air pocket' risks intensify

The Cotality home value index, covering all of Australia, fell 0.9% in August with downward revisions to the previous two months shaving a further 0.7% off prices. The correction has now seen prices decline 3.6% from their March peak. Annual growth has slowed to 2.7%yr.

The detail shows the price correction is becoming more widespread, Cotality reporting 93% of capital city suburbs experienced falls in recent months. Sydney and Melbourne continue to see more pronounced declines, albeit with the latest month suggesting the pace of declines is no longer accelerating. In contrast, price corrections look to have accelerated slightly in most other cities and regional areas. Across segments, unit prices and lower price tiers continue to track slightly milder falls than houses and top tiers.

Note that seasonal variations have accentuated the price weakness through the winter months. The cumulative 3.1% decline over Jun-Jul-Aug is trimmed to 2.5% in seasonally adjusted terms. This slight seasonal headwind typically turns into a slight tailwind through Sep-Oct-Nov. Unless specified, figures in titles, tables and the commentary below are in non-seasonally adjusted terms, consistent with the 'headline' figures reported by Cotality. However, figures shown in charts are in seasonally adjusted terms.

Preliminary estimates of turnover show rolling 3mth volumes down 6.3%qtr in August and 15.2%yr. Cotality have upgraded the process used to estimate the most recent monthly sales, which used to be prone to upward revisions. Interestingly, estimates for the Jul and Aug months point to small rises in seasonally adjusted terms, following a big fall in the Jun month. Other evidence from home loan enquiries also suggests volumes may be stabilising at a low level. The stabilisation picture is clearest in the Sydney and Melbourne markets.

Looking at the price performance across different jurisdictions:

- Sydney again recorded the largest monthly decline, prices down 1.4% in Aug after a downwardly revised 1.8% drop in Jul. Even allowing for seasonality, the last 3mths has seen prices tracking a 15-20% annualised pace of decline. All segments and tiers recorded falls but with top and middle tier houses still tracking a faster pace of decline.
- Melbourne prices declined 1.1% mth, previous months also revised down slightly. Prices are down 4.7%yr and closing in on a 3½yr low in level terms. 'Top tier' house prices are also leading the way but relativities are wider across tiers with prices even holding steady for 'low tier' units. Remarkably, prices market-wide have seen no net gain since mid-2021, and have only just kept pace with inflation since 2015.

- Brisbane prices fell 1% in Aug with Jul's 0.6% decline marked down to -1.2% and Jun's 0.3% gain revised down to a 0.6% fall. The combined effect has taken the rolling 3mth change to -2.7%qtr from a relatively mild previous estimate of -0.6%qtr in Jul. At 10.8%yr, annual growth is still solidly positive but will fall sharply from here. The detail continues to show relatively uniform declines across tiers and dwelling types. Sales volumes are falling rapidly, tracking a 13%qtr pace and down 24%yr. This is driving a rapid shift in what was still an extremely tight market at the start of the year.
- Adelaide dwelling prices declined 0.8%moth, annual growth moderating to 8.6%yr. The price correction only began in May and remains noticeably milder. That said, declines accelerated through Jun-Jul and are becoming more widespread with all sub-markets now seeing some slippage.
- Perth also recorded a 0.8% decline but with previous months marked down sharply (July from flat to -1.3% and June from -0.5% to -1.1%). At 15.6%yr, annual price growth is still strongly positive but set to drop quickly from here. As with Adelaide, the detail is also showing price slippage across all sub-markets. The sales-listings balance is also seeing a sharp whipsaw similar to Brisbane's.
- The smaller capitals were again more mixed, price growth still positive in Darwin (0.6%moth, 14.6%yr), relatively resilient in Hobart (-0.2%moth, 8.1%yr) but weaker in Canberra (-1.1%moth, -0.4%yr).

- Regional markets showed 0.5% declines in NSW Victoria, and Queensland (which includes the Gold and Sunshine Coasts). Annual prices growth remained in positive though, in the 4-5%yr range in NSW and Victoria, and closer to 9%yr in regional Queensland.

Overall, the Aug update shows the price correction is tracking more quickly and broadening. While seasonality is accentuating the shift a little and sales volumes are showing some tentative signs of stabilising at low levels this needs to be set against a pattern of downward revisions that has seen previous price estimates revised significantly lower.

As we noted last month, momentum has become the dominating factor. Seasonal effects will turn positive in coming months but, on their own, these are unlikely to act as a 'circuit breaker'. Likewise, even with a stabilisation in sales volumes, the pull back has caught some sellers on the hop with total on-market listings rising sharply meaning buyers will have the upper hand in most markets heading into Spring.

That all points to a clear risk that we see some 'overshoot' to prices near term, especially if this mix coincides with any additional interest rate increases (still not our base case). How current weakness and the path of interest rates – both actual and expected moves either way – impacts sentiment will be a key area to watch from here, and will likely determine whether conditions stabilise or we see another leg lower in the correction.
